“Therapeutic Fibbing” – Caregiver’s Friend?

While it may seem strange, some caregivers find white lies, also known as therapeutic fibbing, to be a useful tool when it comes to caregiving. Although this often depends on the caregiver and how they feel about it, it has been proven to have a wide range of benefits for loved ones with memory loss.

Benefits of Therapeutic Fibbing

Those with memory loss may believe they were once someone they weren't or may live in their own version of reality. While we know these things never occurred, it can help to play along or validate these beliefs in order to improve their self-esteem and enhance their dignity. While this can seem somewhat harmful at first, it can often bring your loved one a great amount of joy.

Arguing with your loved one about their past and the reality they are living in can often agitate them and cause them to become angry and act irrationally. By using therapeutic fibs, you can help to decrease their negative behaviors, and then redirect the conversation.

Benefits of Therapeutic Fibbing

It can be unsettling when your loved one asks where their spouse or family member who has passed is. Therapeutic fibs, such as telling them that they went to the store and then bringing up some stories or memories about them can help your loved one experience positive memories while decreasing the likelihood they become upset about reliving the truth.

Remember to do what feels right. If you believe that telling a therapeutic fib would help your loved one cope better and have a much better day, then do so. If you believe that they could negatively impact your loved one, then don't. Simply use tools like redirection or even combine them to fit your needs.
